Dove Bradshaw

Dove Bradshaw’s art changes faster than most; that is its point and its splendor. And by acknowledging indeterminacy as central to the working of the natural world, to a universe that expands, Bradshaw’s work exults in the excellence of nature as it is, in chance and randomness and the irreversibility of time.

Bradshaw works by setting natural processes in motion, then withdrawing to observe the results. Her Contingency series demonstrates unpredictable chemistry in action. Canvases of linen, canvas or flax paper incorporate unstable chemicals that respond over time to changes in light and humidity and record the process of oxidation. In the Indeterminacy series, stones bleed into stones, leaving haunting patterns.

The changes occur on two time scales. There is the immediate action of the chemicals. Then there is the slower, evolutionary one in which the environment becomes catalyst. Most people who see this art will not see it change, will not visit the works often enough and over a long enough period of time to witness the evolution. But we know that chemistry is at work, we understand that what we see is a record of a process and we see in the works their impermanence and, through their challenging the notion of an art object as reliably one thing, their impertinence.
